WEATHER OF CONCERN

Weather of Concern

- An avalanche warning is in effect through 12/24/16 at 0700 hours for Alpine, El Dorado, Nevada, and Placer Counties.
- Heavier showers may contain small hail in the North Coast this afternoon through tomorrow morning. Generally 1/2" to 1" is forecast for most urban spots with 1-3" for our coastal ranges. Scattered showers and small hail possible on Saturday, and snow accumulation above 3500 feet is possible Saturday morning. Drier conditions are expected by Christmas Day, and dry weather may continue into early next week.
- Tonight through tomorrow, a winter storm will bring widespread, and heavy at times, precipitation. Heavy snow will be possible in the mountains above roughly 5000 feet, with lighter snow and less accumulation down to around 3000 feet. There will be a potential for flooding, especially near recent wildfire burn scars.

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

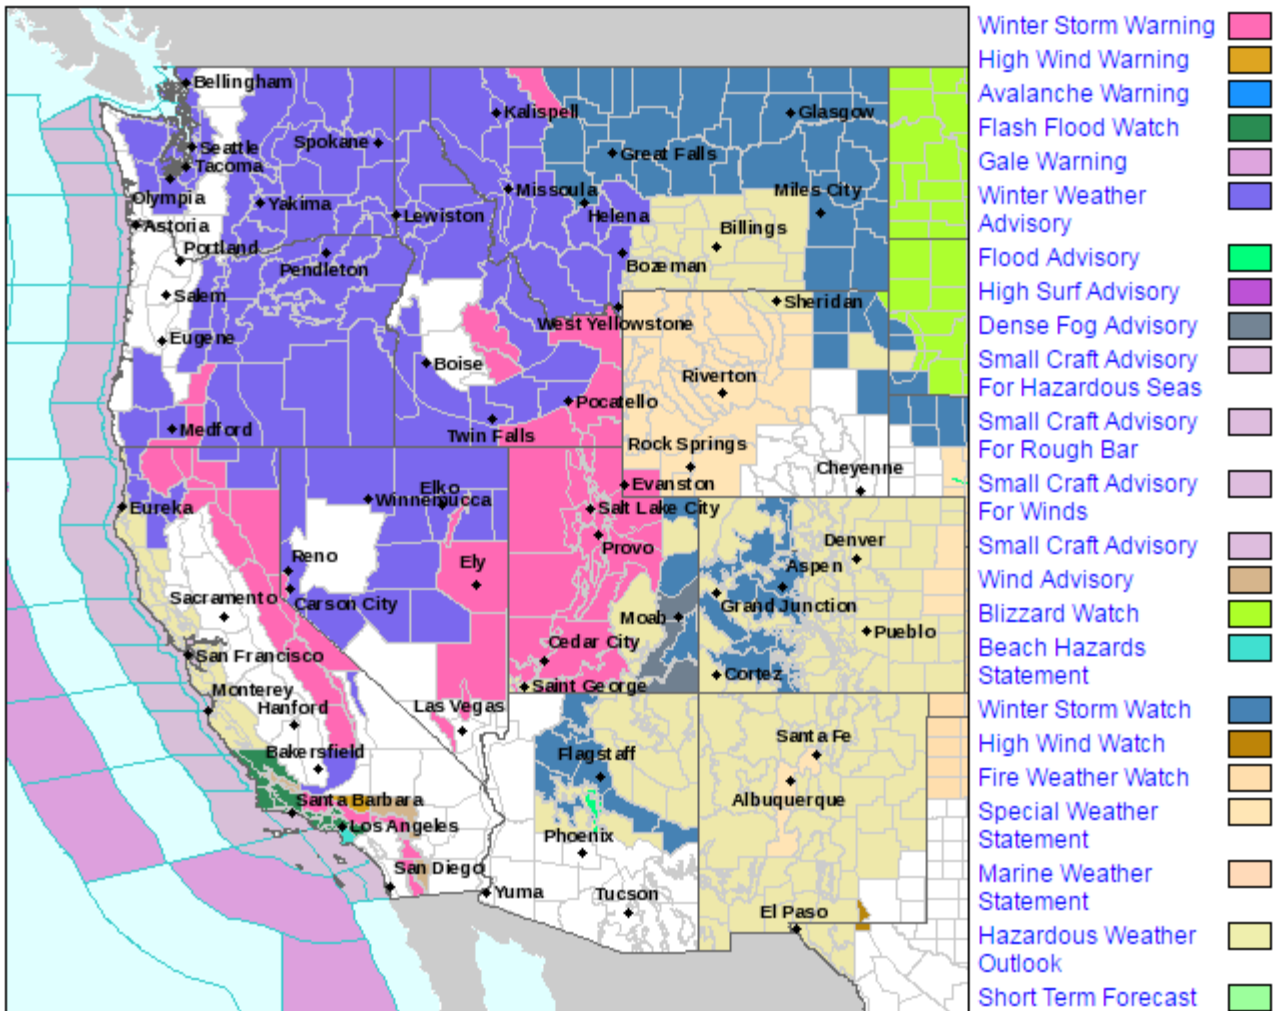

The Pacific storm system passing through the region is producing moderate to heavy precipitation. The main front is moving into western areas this morning and the precipitation is in the form of scattered to numerous showers behind the front. Wind-prone areas will see southerly gusts reach 30-40 mph along and ahead of the cold front today. Snow levels are starting out between 4000-5000 feet, but falling to 2000-3500 feet once the front passes. The last showers will end in the eastern mountains midday Saturday. On Christmas Day a weak Pacific low pressure system will move toward Central California. Light rain showers are possible in the Bay Area and Mid Coast PSAs Christmas Night as the low moves southeastward, remaining offshore. Other areas will remain partly cloudy, cool, and dry. For the most part, the region will be partly cloudy and dry with a gradual warming trend Monday through next Friday. However, a few showers passing through southern Oregon may occasionally reach into far Northern California during this time.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

A cold front will sweep through the region today, bringing gusty winds and periods of heavy rain. Currently, the heaviest rain is occurring in the Bay Area with lighter rain associated with the front now entering the Monterey and San Luis Obispo coastal regions. This front will drop southeastward through the day, bring a 3-4 hour period of moderate to occasionally heavy rain. The front may reach Santa Barbara County by early afternoon and the rest of Southern California by late afternoon and evening. Rainfall rates may exceed a half inch per hour, especially on south and southwest facing aspects during the passage of the front. Flash flooding will be a concern across recent burn areas. The snow level will be around 7,000 feet today, falling to 3,500 feet overnight. In all, expect 1-3 inches of rain along the central coast with 2-4" possible in the Sierra Foothills and on south-facing slopes of the mountains in Southern California. Snowfall will range from 1-2 feet in the Sierras above 6,000 feet to 8-16 inches above 6,500 feet in the mountains of Southern California. South wind gusts to 35 mph will be possible this afternoon and evening. The storm will quickly depart the region late tonight, but some showers will be possible on the north aspects through Saturday morning. Travel through I-5 and I-15 may be impeded Saturday morning. Expect strong west winds of 20-30 mph with gusts to 50 mph through the Banning Pass into the desert Saturday. A quiet weather pattern will ensue next week with sunny and warmer weather returning to the area.
